

Portfolio Shift Commentary: January 21, 2015

As stated in the Year End letter, from a regional perspective we still favor US equities but recently adding to the developed international allocation. Given the magnitude of underperformance in international equities, along with a commitment for increased stimulus from Japan and the Eurozone, it appears to be an attractive time to add to these two areas of the market.

The European Central Bank, for example, is all but certain to announce that it will engage in a massive bond-buying program tomorrow, similar to what the Federal Reserve had been deploying for the five years ending in late 2014.

Draghi has signaled his willingness to do "What Ever It Takes." He wants to increase the ECB's balance sheet by about 1 trillion euros, a decision that would bring it up to a level of 3 trillion euros. But this goal cannot be reached by buying private-sector debt alone. The ECB will have to purchase sovereign bonds, so-called "public QE," to achieve their goals. In the United States and Japan, the new liquidity created by similar policies flew into financial markets. As a result, QE fueled equity markets and drove the price of real estate and bonds. At the same time, central banks' QE policies have tended to reduce the strength of their individual currencies, a development that has benefited domestic companies by boosting exports.

Since the Japan market reversals in mid-October, the Nikkei has gained some 20%, fueled by good company results and the prospect of sustained expansionary monetary policy. Even though we view the reform measures with a grain of salt, we believe market momentum will persist for some time giving Japan some room to run.

As always, we thank you all for your continued support and look forward to discussing any or all of our thoughts at your convenience.

Best Regards,

Teresa Finney, AIF®
Senior Vice President, Investments

This information is general in nature, is not a complete statement of all information necessary for making an investment decision, and is not a recommendation or a solicitation to buy or sell any security. Views expressed are the current opinion of the author, but not necessarily those of Raymond James and are subject to change without notice. Past performance is not indicative of future results. There is no assurance these trends will continue or that forecasts mentioned will occur. The Nikkei index is an unmanaged index which is representative of the Japanese stock market. It is not possible to invest directly in an index. Investing always involves risk and you may incur a profit or loss. No investment strategy can guarantee success. International investing involves additional risks such as currency fluctuations, differing financial accounting standards, and possible political and economic instability. These risks are greater in emerging markets. Investing in the energy sector involves special risks and may not be suitable for all investors. Raymond James & Associates, Inc., Member New York Stock Exchange/SIPC.